Summary: Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelenskiy has intensified his appeals to the United States for support in striking deeper into Russian territory following meetings with U.S. officials. Since 2022, the U.S. has supplied Ukraine with over $50 billion in military aid, but has restricted the use of these weapons to defensive operations within Ukrainian borders. In his nightly address, Zelenskiy emphasized the importance of clearing Ukrainian airspace of Russian weapons to encourage Russia to seek a resolution to the ongoing war. He called for long-range capabilities, including missiles and shells, to adequately protect Ukraine. Ukrainian Defence Minister Rustem Umerov, part of the delegation in Washington, highlighted the potential for targeting Russian airfields used for attacks on Ukrainian cities. He expressed hope that U.S. officials understood Ukraine's needs. Zelenskiy is expected to reiterate these demands in person next month, alongside discussions at the United Nations General Assembly. Additionally, Economy Minister Yulia Svyrydenko mentioned the urgent need for a significant energy infrastructure recovery package, given that Russian strikes have severely impacted Ukraine's power systems. The discussions come as Ukraine faces escalating missile and drone attacks from Russia.
