A Himalayan river may be making Everest taller

Source: BBC News

Published: Mon, 30 Sep 2024 15:00:57 GMT

URL: <https://www.bbc.com/news/articles/c1wn827dedyo>

Summary: A recent study reveals that river erosion at the base of Mount Everest contributes to its upward growth. Researchers have found that as rivers carve into the mountainside, they continuously remove material from the base, which in turn allows the mountain to rise. This process occurs because the erosion reduces the weight at the mountain's base, leading the Earth's crust to rebound and push the peak higher. The study highlights the dynamic interactions between geological processes and topographical features, challenging previous beliefs that external factors such as tectonic activity were solely responsible for the mountain's elevation. The findings suggest that active geological processes like erosion play a crucial role in shaping the natural landscape. By understanding these mechanisms, scientists can better predict how mountains like Everest may continue to evolve over time. This research not only provides insights into the dynamics of one of the world's tallest peaks but also emphasizes the importance of erosion in mountain formation and growth. Overall, the study reaffirms the interconnectedness of Earth's systems, showcasing how various forces work together to influence geological phenomena.
